just to follow-up: i had read on one of the other kustom sites (kustom player, i think) that some of the earlier cabs for pa were only for vocals (utilized the mid-range), but later models were ok for just about any application. unfortunately, i didn't see much that dictated where in the timeline the 302s fell. They have 3x10 and 2x12 in each column - that seems like it should be versatile, but i have no idea how the speakers are voiced. the idea of those two columns on stage, monolith-style, really makes me excited for some reason ...

I have never done this but if you think about it the guitar is a pretty mid range instrument. It would'nt be good for bass of course because there is not enough room for the bass reflex of the of the speakers to properly reproduce the bass tones. But lead guitar should be no problem. I have 2x10/2x12 speakers in a single cab the same size as a 3x12 cab and it sounds great for guitar. I even heard a fella play one of those old farasia organs thru those columns and it sounded good. As you know those organs are pretty limited in the number of keys they have too. So he was not getting in the bass frequencies territory there.

Yeah if you like em go for it. I'd like to add a red or blue amp to the stable myself and would probably buy some if I ran up on some at good price. They would be nice of back fills on a Pa or as guitar cabs.
